Impossible to evacuate amid continued shelling - Mariupol deputy mayor

More now from Mariupol's deputy mayor - who says they have decided to move citizens back, and stop the evacuation, as it's not safe on the streets.

Serhiy Orlov tells the BBC there's continuous shelling in Mariupol, and along the agreed evacuation route, near the city of Orikhiv.

"It's not safe to go by this road because of these fights," he says.

The Ukrainian government is already speaking to Russian officials about the breach of the ceasefire, he says, and negotiations are ongoing.

BREAKING Evacuation of Mariupol has been postponed

The evacuation of civilians from Mariupol has been postponed, according to the Mariupol city council. It says the Russian side has not been observing the temporary ceasefire in place.

It says residents should disperse and find places of shelter, and that more information will be given soon.

A few minutes ago the city's deputy mayor told the BBC that Mariupol was still being shelled, and there are also reports that fighting is ongoing near the end of the evacuation route.
